Polygon's Ralph Archibald stops to point out the hilltop view from the exterior of one of the new Tyneridge townhouses, now for sale on Burke Mountain in Coquitlam. "This is a true example of great value for your money," says Archibald, senior vice-president of sales and marketing, gesturing to the Craftsman-style design, wood shingling and stone details. "It's really nice — attractive."

So is the price, he says. The town houses — mostly three-bedroom offerings that range from 1,255 to 1,395 square feet — start at $389,900.

"Our target is people who are looking to buy their first home," says Archibald, adding they would appeal to "people who have bought a condo in the past few years and have outgrown it."

Archibald says that during the first weekend that Tyneridge was open to the public, 25 of the 37 homes that were offered for sale were snapped up. "Not surprising," he says. "Most of our buyers were first-time."

Located at the corner of Soball Street and David Avenue, Tyneridge is part of a massive overall development of the mountain by Wesbild. (Wesbild also developed Coquitlam's Westwood Plateau, completed in 2005.)

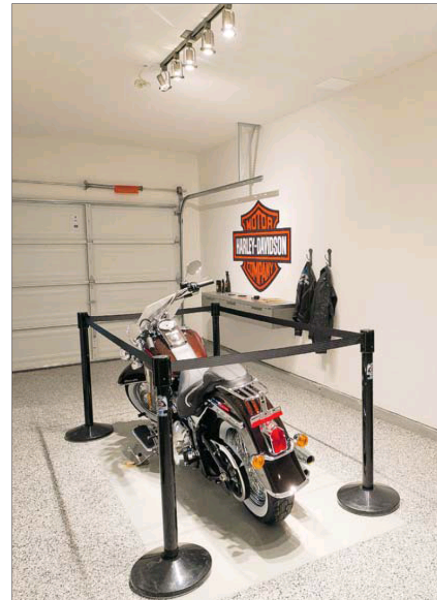

The master-planned community — known as The Foothills at Burke Mountain — will eventually include more than 1,300 homes. The project's website (www.thefoothillsatburke.com) says The Foothills "marks the return of pedestrian-friendly sidewalks and an inviting neighbourly community."

There are plans for walking and cycling trails, it says, and for stream reclamation to help "bring back salmon long gone from streams." In addition to new schools, it notes, there will be a village centre with shops and services in the heart of the neighbourhood.

The open and airy living and dining room areas of the Tyneridge housing development have a bright and cheery appearance. The two-car garage in the showhome was decorated with a Harley-Davidson motorcycle and logos, as well as leather jackets to set up a "memory point" for potential buyers, anticipated to be younger couples who have outgrown their first condo.
