River District gets the nod at Land Awards

River District gets the nod at Land Awards

Sun

Saturday, November, 12, 2011

ParkLane Homes' River District, a 130-acre community on the Fraser River in southeast Vancouver, was recently recognized at the Real Estate Foundation of B.C.'s 2011 Land Awards.

The awards are held to acknowledge "leadership, innovation and collaboration related to the sustainable use and conservation of land in British Columbia," says the foundation on its website.

The River District took the award in the private-sector category.

The Land Awards also recognize the contributions of nonprofit organizations and government bodies.

The River District development is in an area formerly known as East Fraserlands, and will eventually comprise more than 7,000 residential units, as well as retail and commercial space.

Home builder Polygon Homes has partnered with ParkLane Homes on Phase 1 of development, a project called New Water.

Most of the units in the first building were purchased by residents in the immediate neighbourhood. The second building went on sale a week ago. "One of the key things is that this is a Vancouver address," says Ralph Archibald, Polygon's senior vice-president of sales and marketing. "The opportunity to buy a woodframe apartment within a master-planned community in Vancouver doesn't exist anywhere but here. It's a real hidden gem. Because it's not on a busy road, it's not something people know a lot about." New Water is the first new condo development in the area since Southampton, built by Polygon in 1998, and has attracted first-time homebuyers, young professionals and young families with children and downsizers, mainly from the Fraserview, Champlain Heights and Killarney neighbourhood. "Because it's our first one in, we designed the buildings to have something for everyone, from our larger corner homes all the way down to the one beds," says Archibald. The two four-storey buildings will be similar in design, with West Coast modern architecture, brick and concrete cladding, heavy timber and granite detailing, and glass and steel accents. Raised roof sections will add visual interest to the exterior and mean ceiling heights of up to 12 feet in some top-floor units. All top-floor homes will have ceilings at least nine feet high, and every home will have large windows to take in the light and the view. All residences will have access to the outdoors via groundfloor patios or balconies on the upper floors. An amenity room with a fitness studio, meeting room and kitchenette will be adjacent to a common courtyard on the north side of the buildings. "If you wanted to do some entertaining, you could definitely do it down here and then spill out into the courtyard and enjoy the outside as well," says sales coordinator Grace Ip. "There are going to be some plots of garden areas where people can grow their own food if they want to, tomatoes or cucumbers or whatever you like to grow. There's going to be a small playground area in the back, as well. "It's just an open space for everyone to enjoy." Interiors will be clean-lined and modern, with square-edge wood cabinetry and quartz countertops in kitchens and baths. Two-bedroom homes enjoy both a soaker tub and a semiframeless, glass walk-in shower. All kitchens have a stainless steel Bosch dishwasher, electric wall oven, gas cooktop and combination microwave-hood fan, along with a Fisher and Paykel bottom-mount fridge, full-sized Amana stacking washer/dryer and rollout recycling bin stations for organizing recyclables.

New Water is following Built Green gold standards for sustainable materials and building practices that include in-floor hot-water radiant heat, CRI Green-label carpets, tile with 25-percent recycled content and water-based low-VOC paint with at least 20-per-cent recycled content. As well as a car share vehicle for each building, there will also be bicycles available for residents to sign out for touring the neighbourhood, a new feature from Polygon. Ultimately, though, the most stunning feature here is the setting. New Water is removed from Marine Way, near the Fraser River and on the western edge of the site, where residents will not be affected by future construction as River District builds out. A riverside path for walkers, runners and cyclists stretches all the way from New Westminster to Knight Street. New Water is just across the plaza from the River District Centre, which provides information about the neighbourhood and future development. "Almost everyone that we bring in here, when they come in and see this overall model, it's a 'wow' reaction, not only from the actual size of it but because they had no idea it was happening," says Archibald. The centre has also been discovered by local residents of the West Fraserlands, who use it as a community drop-in spot and activity centre and flock to the new Romer's Burger Bar in the same building, where they can relax on the patio overlooking the river. © Copyright (c) The Vancouver Sun

Development celebrates opening

OFFICIAL: ParkLane Homes and Polygon Homes unveil River District, a 130-acre project on Fraser River

BY MIKE RAPTIS
THE PROVINCE

River District, a 130-acre development on the shores of the Fraser River and Southeast Vancouver, celebrated its official opening Saturday.

"It's a truly sustainable, walkable green community," said Ben Taddei of developer ParkLane Homes, in partnership in the massive project with Polygon Homes.

The waterfront development — adjacent to Champlain Heights and the West Fraserlands — features over 20 acres of parks, 10 volleyball courts, and retail space in its newly unveiled "Experience Centre": a multi-use building that already includes Romer's Burger Bar and Urban Rec store.

The Experience Centre, a privately funded community building, is also in partnership with Family Place and includes a drop-in centre for parents and children in the area. Seventy units of the first phase of apartments have been sold within the first three weeks.

River District is expected to become a community of approximately 15,000 residents over the next 15-20 years, and "will be the town centre for this part of the city," said Taddei. Polygon Homes is also a developer in the project. River District has received national attention, winning the "Best Neighbourhood Plan" award for the Canadian Institute of Planning in 2006. Future phases of the community will include a restaurant on the water, two schools — including a high school and elementary school — a community centre, park space and a waterfront pier.

Peter Wesik, president of ParkLane Homes, Milt Bowling, East Fraser Lands Committee representative, Raymond Louie, deputy mayor City of Vancouver, and Scott Baldwin, senior VP of development for Polygon Homes, officially open River District. JASON PAYNE — PNG

More fathers staying at home to look after children

BY ALYSSA NOEL
THE PROVINCE

The number of stay-at-home dads in the country has tripled in the last 30 years, but it seems Canadians' views — and Vancouver's resources — are lagging behind the times.

A new study, commissioned by BMO Financial Group in time for Father's Day, found that 65 per cent of Canadians still believe it's more "socially acceptable" for women to stay home and care for family, despite Statistics Canada's findings that more fathers than ever before are taking on those duties.

Jill Amery, a West Vancouver mom

who started online magazine urbanmommies.com four years ago and its counterpart, urbandaddies.com, last year, said she's seen a spike in Vancouver-area fathers becoming homemakers.

"I know several," she said. "I think in Vancouver we run into a different situation because the cost of living is so high. I find there are pockets of large communities of stay-at-home dads, but there are also a lot of families where both parents must work in order to afford the cost of living. I do find though, that in Vancouver being a stay-at-home dad is a little more accepted."

Around 59 per cent of Canadians

"I find there are pockets of large communities of stay-at-home dads"

— Founder of online magazine urbanmommies.com, Jill Amery attributed the Mr. Mom spike to increased gender equality, both at home and in the workplace.

Amery agreed.

"It's very encouraging to women because it indicates that women are now being compensated in the workforce at a similar level to their male counterparts," she said.

Over half of Canadians also believe the trend is due to more women becoming breadwinners. About a third think the recession impacted the shift in household duties by putting more men out of work.

While Vancouver is flush with plenty of mommy-and-me groups, dads don't have the same kind of options for community activities, Amery said.

"I would say it's significantly lacking. I know of very, very few groups that cater to just dads that are a registered group. What I find is stay-at-home dads are connecting themselves through meetups.com," she said. "They're developing their own networks because nothing else exists for them."

She said the government and community centres, including yoga studios and swimming pools, should consider funding dad-specific programs.

"I really want to see some good, healthy support coming out for men who are giving a significant part of their time to caring and nurturing their children," she said.

More than 7,000 homes will be constructed on 130 acres on former East Fraserlands

Life begins anew on former industrial site Barbara Gunn

Sun

Saturday, September, 17, 2011

Stroll along the wooden boardwalk that fronts the north side of the Fraser River at the foot of Kerr Street, and you'd scarcely be reminded of the area's gritty, industrial past. Dog-walkers pause to rest on the benches and to watch the tugs chug along the water. Cyclists and joggers appear, then disappear beyond the trees and fields of wildflowers. Children race out to the pier or gambol on the wooden climbing structure, while their parents unload picnic fare on the grass outside Romer's Burger Bar. For many years - decades, in fact - this was no picnic destination. Rather, it was home to sawmills such as the Canadian White Pine Mill, which, at its peak in 1968, shipped finished lumber to four continents, enough to build 21,000 homes a year. In the years ahead,

We expect that future phases of the development, which will include townhomes, will attract more families, making the river District a very family-friendly neighbourhood in the city, says Parklane Homes chief operations officer Ben taddei.

this neighbourhood - formerly called the East Fraserlands - will also speak to homes. More than 7,000, in fact, will be constructed on some 130 acres along the Fraser River south of Marine Way and between Kerr and Boundary Road, an undertaking from the award-winning ParkLane Homes that will represent one of the largest development projects in Vancouver over the next two decades. This is the River District. When complete, 15 or 20 years down the road, the area will be a community in the truest sense of the word. A mix of residential towers, townhouses and low-to midrise structures will dot the riverside landscape. (ParkLane has partnered with Polygon Homes to build New Water, the site's first apartments.) The official development plan approved unanimously by the City of Vancouver also includes park and retail space, a community centre, daycares and sites for both elementary and secondary schools. As such, says ParkLane's chief operating officer Ben Taddei, the River District will represent a prime example of new urbanism: walkable neighbourhoods that have a mix of uses and housing, and include parks and public spaces. It will be a neighbourhood, emphasizes Taddei, sure to appeal to a vast array of residents. "Like every neighbourhood in Vancouver, it's a mixed bag," he notes. "There are singles, couples, families, downsizers, you name it. We expect that future phases of the development, which will include townhomes, will attract more families, making the River District a very family-friendly neighbourhood in the city." He adds some 20 per cent of the residences - or 1,300 units - will be designated as social housing, meaning "the homes can be seniors' housing, affordable family housing or even market rental homes." When the River District vision is realized, it will represent the culmination of years of a collaborative effort that involved multiple participants. "When the sawmill closed down in 2001, there was much talk in the city as to what would happen with this last 130-acre piece of land in Vancouver," Taddei explains. "For ParkLane, it meant undertaking a collaborative development process with the city, the local community and numerous other stakeholders. We worked through countless workshops, public information meetings and design plans to arrive at the plan we have today. After eight years of planning and process, we are very proud to see it start coming to life." And coming to life, it is. The homes on the River District property may not yet be built, but the neighbourhood is already bustling with people. The 6,000-squarefoot waterfront River District Centre, home to both Romer's Burger Bar and a presentation centre for the future project, is also a community centre of sorts, offering such things as drop-in yoga, book clubs and programming for young children. "It is so rewarding to see people using and enjoying the public spaces here at River District; it's the ultimate test of urban planning and design," says Taddei, whose 30-year-old company was named the top home builder in Canada at a 2010 industry competition sponsored by the Canadian Home Builders Association.

Romer's Burger Bar, is sure to see its business ramp up as the River District takes shape over the next 15 to 20 years. the restaurant is in the River District Centre, which also serves as a presentation centre for the development and a community gathering spot.

It's a company with an impressive resume, yet in some respects, notes Taddei, the River District will be something of a standout. "There are so many innovative approaches taken here, from our songbird strategy to our construction of a privately funded community building," he says. "River District represents an undertaking that has regional and, one could even argue, international significance." Visitors are welcome at the River District any time, but Sept. 25 promises to be a particularly good day to come by. In honour of B.C. Rivers Day - an annual event held throughout the province on the last Sunday of September - the new community on the Fraser River is hosting an afternoon of fun. Activities include a yoga session, an origami workshop and a pie-baking competition. (Advance registration is required for the latter.) As well, there will be arts and crafts booths, live jazz and a Vancouver Art Gallery table. For more information, visit riverdistrict.ca. © Copyright (c) The Vancouver Sun
