Where: 2907 Wall St., Vancouver

Sales Centre: 2965 Wall St., Vancouver

Hours: noon - 5 p.m., Sat. to Thurs.

Blending the old with the new works seamlessly in Avant, a new Aragon Properties' development in one of Vancouver's oldest neighbourhoods.

The Wall Street area has a rich heritage of commercial and industrial use alongside single family homes and one-storey apartments. To the east is a warehouse and grain elevators, to the north, the Ironworkers Memorial Bridge, and between the residences and the harbour are the CPR's railway tracks.

Aragon Properties' interior design division has a passion for signature touches. At Avant, that comes through in the full-length reclaimed brick feature wall.

"It creates a very urban feel, which suits the area where Avant is located overlooking the train tracks, port and busy inlet," interior designer Maria Zoubos says. "The reclaimed brick integrates so well in the contemporary open space."

"Also, the monochromatic kitchen is rarely seen, but adds such drama to the space."

The project has a well equipped fitness room accessed through the parking garage

The master bedroom has an alcove with double paned windows that provide soundproofing.

A rooftop garden space provides superb views of the harbour and mountains.

Zoubos describes the project's style as one that is rooted in tradition — as is evident in those stone feature walls, which include local reclaimed brick and slate ledge stone — with modern accents.

Layering modern furnishings with old features creates a warm and inviting room.

"The furnishings are modern and minimal with a sophisticated edge and warm tones to let anyone feel like this could be home," Zoubos adds.

Avant, a six-building low-rise development that overlooks the city's harbour, targets the experienced and discerning buyer, those who know what they want.

"When designing the interior, it is important to assess who that buyer would be and design for them as opposed to designing for the location," she says. When designing this show suite, it was important for the design team to keep the space clean and as open as possible to let "all the amazing features to shine through," Zoubos continues.

"These features include wide-plank white oak flooring, stone feature wall, beautiful European styled white oak doors, dramatic ceiling height kitchens and top-of-the-line appliance package."

The living, dining and kitchen areas were intended to maximize the views through the bank of floor-to-ceiling windows, while creating the greatest sense of space.

When giving her clients decor tips, Zoubos tells them: "Don't over-think it and keep things simple, less is more. All you need is a few key pieces and some well thought out accessories to pull a room together."

Sometimes finding a home is as simple as riding a bike. At least that's how Walter Martz and his spouse ended up buying a unit in a development on East Vancouver's Wall Street, aptly named Avant.

"The encounter was not planned for," Martz says. "We accidentally ran into the property while on a bike ride one day."

What attracted the couple to Avant, a six-building low-rise development overlooking Vancouver harbour, was the resemblance to their hometown of Hamburg, Germany, also a harbour city. "The [North Shore] mountains are a little extra."

The couple had considered buying a heritage home, but worried about the expense of upgrading and maintaining an older home. A new two-bedroom suite in Avant was a major attraction, especially with a 2-5-10 year comprehensive New Home warranty that covers everything from appliances to defects in the building.

The well equipped fitness room is accessible through the underground parking garage, and has ground level windows.

Master bedrooms at Avant have small alcoves. There are five types of units in the project, ranging up to 1,755 square feet.

Avant, which was designed by Ramsay Worden architects, is in an East Vancouver neighbourhood with a rich history of commercial and industrial use, alongside apartments and single family homes. PHOTOS: KIM STALLKNECHT / PNG

While the decision was a relatively easy for Martz, coming up with a design that satisfied the city's development board and residents living in the tightly knit neighbourhood was anything but for Doug Ramsay and his Vancouver architecture firm. From start to finish, the process the process took seven years, with Ramsay's firm being called upon after the first architect's concept was turned down by the city's development board.

"So many neighbours came out [to oppose the concept] that it was defeated," said Ramsay, adding the area's residents were concerned about their views and the density of the pro-posed development, a U-shaped two-building mid-rise structure.

But necessity is the mother of invention, and Ramsay and his team went to work to come up with a plan that would win over the neighbours. After much consultation, the compromise solution was a lower density development consisting of six separate low-rise buildings that preserved some of the neighbourhood's view corridors. While the design did win over the neighbours and the development board's approval, Ramsay's challenges were not over.

The neighbourhood, one of the city's oldest, and has a rich heritage of commercial and industrial use alongside single-family homes and one-storey apartments. To the east is a warehouse and grain elevators, to north, the Iron-workers Memorial Bridge, and between the residences and the harbour are the CPR's railway tracks.

The environment appeals to those who like to be in the ebb and flow of things, including the freighters and tugs plying the harbour waters, the movement of trains in and out of the rail yards and the stream of flat-bed trucks hauling containers to and from the docks. Extensive acoustical testing was undertaken to determine what level of soundproofing would be required. "That led to a strategy of dealing with the noise through the use of bricks and enclosed balconies and the adoption of geo-thermal heating and cooling," Ramsay said.

"The use of heat pumps for every unit meant not only economical heating, but also flexibility for residents. With regulations requiring non-opening windows facing the tracks and roads, residents can use the heat pump's air-conditioning feature in the summer to cool their units," said Ramsay. In the summer months, the extraction of heat from the units also allowed the geo-thermal system to recharge the earth beneath the development.

Also reducing possible noise is an insulated parking garage that effectively raised the development's profile on the slope even higher above the road and railway beds.

The measures appear to have worked well. During a visit, the train and truck traffic below was barely audible from any of the units, including those closest to the road and railway.

Also supporting soundproofing was double-glazing and the use of alcoves off the master bedroom to provide an air buffer from the noise below.

In a bid to integrate Avant into the area of single-family homes, all units have their own entrance, some with front porches. There also is a refreshing absence of gates or walls. Within the development, the long, thin units that are oriented 90 degrees to Wall Street, giving as many Avant residents as possible views of the harbour and mountains. Increasing the view possibilities are the long and angled bay windows.

The units are also stacked in such a way to match living and sleeping areas above and below.

The units come in five types, ranging in size from 1,193 to 1,755 square feet and of the 48 put on the market last year, just 11 remain for sale. The lower-level units have back doors and walkout patios that open onto a landscaped courtyard between the buildings.

Many of the units have rooftop patios that provide expansive views of the harbour and North Shore mountains. They are accessed through narrow stairwells leading up to a piston-mounted skylights that easily open like hatches. On the steel-clad roof deck are cosy built-in outdoor fire-places to take the edge off cool spring and fall evenings. There are also water hose bibs for those wanting to develop a roof top gardens. The patios are separated by glass dividers that allow for view while providing some sound privacy.

Inside, the living, dining and kitchen areas are organized to maximize the views through the bank of floor-to-ceiling windows while creating the greatest sense of space. Units have full-height feature walls of reclaimed brick or white ledge stone. Floors are wire-brushed wide plank engineered oak through the main living area. Units have linear burner gas fire-places set in porcelain tile. All kitchens have granite slab countertops in a honed or polished finish and Kohler single basin undermount sinks. Cabinets are in flat panel vertical grain with a clear walnut or oak finish. The appliance package is premium quality GE Monogram with a 36-inch built-in Energy Star-rated refrigerator in stainless steel, four-burner gas range with electric oven, a built-in micro-wave and stainless steel dishwasher with hidden electronic controls.

The main bathrooms have granite slab countertops and frameless glass shower enclosures while powder rooms and ensuite bathrooms have marble slab countertops and tub-shower enclosures. The units have Energy Star-rated large capacity GE washers and gas dryers.

One extra perk for Martz is the fitness room. He said he has not used one before but after noting how it is so well equipped and easy to access through the garage, he has added keeping fit to his schedule.

If necessity truly is the mother of invention, then we can thank Vancouver's shrinking supply of developable land for inspiring planners to unearth innovative pockets of paradise we didn't know we had.

A case in point is the forthcoming esplanade waterfront development at the base of Renfrew Street in East Vancouver. Renfrew waterfront, you say?

Believe it. Trip down to Wall Street at Renfrew to the site of Avant, and you' ll find a postcard scene replete with rolling green space and sea views of the whitecapped Burrard Inlet over to the snow-capped North Shore mountains.

The neighbourhood' s industrial roots are represented, too; there is a working port nearby and rail tracks along the waterside paths.

Developer Aragon began planning the intriguing site that is Avant in 2004, smitten by the unique location tucked away in a little known, yet highly regarded neighbourhood north of McGill Street.

“To us, this neighbourhood is the east side equivalent of Cornwall Street,” says David Roppel, director of planning and development for Aragon Properties Ltd. “We felt that the locale with its unparalleled views and parks added up to an ideal location for West Coast living.”

True to form, on a sunny day there is an inlet breeze wafting the scent of fresh-cut lawn; joggers and dog-walkers are out in force; several amateur photographers are shooting the mountains, and a handful of cyclists roll on by. Alas, there aren' t any sunbathers or fish and chips kiosks, however — not yet, at least.

The existing neighbourhood is just plain lovely. Think unpretentious, well-built single-family homes, staggered politely on a slight rise to catch the picturesque scene.

It' s no wonder that the first-round massing schemes for Avant, squarely in front of the existing community, raised more than a few eyebrows. The first plan included two four-storey apartment buildings with a large view corridor between them, according to Roppel.

But based on community feedback, the project was redesigned to include six slimmer buildings, fanned finger-like, perpendicular to the street with views and courtyard corridors between each. Visually, the result feels calm and conciliatory, allowing more neighbours to retain their old views and more Avant residents to boast new views.

Avant is designed to be both neighbourly and family-friendly. It' s adjacent to New Brighton Park and the community centre with an outdoor pool, public amenities that are expected to be significant draws. Aragon is also counting on young families, complete with parents who value extra room, private front-door entry and green space over the downtown scene. Having said that, downtown, accessed easily via Wall Street, is a mere 13-minute drive away.

To appeal to the urban set, architectural design is simple, sleek and modern. A signature angled steel roof defines the form, with a warm brick facade. Those on the top floor also enjoy dramatic rooftop inset decks.

While downtown towers flaunt the ultimate desirability of living in a penthouse, Avant has its own version of exclusivity, the three-level estate-style endhouse with private parkade access and stellar views.

But all residents have private decks or patios and access to a residential fitness facility in a prime spot near the water. The rooftop decks have sexy gas fireplaces, as well.

Overall heating and cooling is provided by geothermal technology, opted in by the developer, and described as a tangible green benefit to residents. Geothermal air conditioning reduces greenhouse gas emissions over traditional heating and cooling methods.

“Geothermal is not completely novel by any means, but it’s not commonplace,” says David Wan, director of sales and marketing at Aragon. “We are trying to do our part in terms of eco-measures that we can put into the development that genuinely benefit residents.”

Part of the deal is that residents will not be charged for the use of geothermal (with the exception of maintenance within their strata fees, not expected to be more than standard systems).

Once indoors, the mood is decidedly Yaletown, but more spaciouly so.

“We like to surprise people,” says Wan of the ultra-urban lofty vibe with a nod to industry.

A full-height reclaimed feature wall of recycled brick from vintage Vancouver buildings says “warehouse chic”. A sumptuous oyster-white ledge stone wall is also on offer, depending on the chosen colour scheme.

Kitty-corner in the living space, the large, linear gas fireplace playfully flickers, while underfoot — another surprise — super-wide engineered hardwood in white oak, with a unique wire brushed distressed effect, manages to be both edgy and elegant.

The granite kitchen has all the bells and whistles, including flat-panel cabinetry with soft-touch closures, a fleet of GE monogram stainless steel appliances and a ferocious Faber fan. Kohler faucets and fixtures are found in the cook and bathing spaces.

In the bath, the styling is about sanctuary, yet the designer has upped the ante with rich marble countertops rather than the usual granite. It's another example of attending to the finer details to set this development apart, says Wan.

"We do want to be a little bit different, but as developers, it's getting harder and harder to really distinguish yourself, because the quality is getting so good on so many developments," Wan admits.

In the case of this development's forward thinking began with the name and tag line: Avant "Lead the way", chosen mostly because of the surprise factor of the neighbourhood — to make a proposition that offers typical city-dwellers or suburbanites something a little unexpected in terms of lifestyle and location.

Admittedly, it's a bit of a gamble, notes Wan when interviewed a week before the property was released to market and sales begin. Although bottom line, Aragon is really about good value for money and bang for buck in terms of finishing and Avant fits that bill, he insists.

Turns out, he needn't have questioned the proposition one bit. One week after opening, 35 out of 48 units have sold. Response is brisk and enthusiastic, says Wan, with the undiscovered gem now officially out of the bag.

"We felt that in order for someone to come in to Avant, they had to have the spirit of a pioneer because there has not been much development in this area," says Wan. "It's new and it dares them to be a little bit different, if they're ready to pave the way."

So far, they are.
